They had too mysterious a power to be put aside. The fire had no power, v. 27. The whole court, the king s officials of every kind, had rushed together to see this new wonder. A hasty examination was made by all, but triers was no evidence that the fire had touched them, not even a hair of their head was singed, no smell of fire was on them, nor their hosen changed; so from head to foot they were perfectly sound. It was a mighty wonder; the only explanation must be that a God greater than all the gods of Babylon had saved them. But where was their divine companion? His work done, he was no longer visible. Blessed be the God of Shadrach, v. 28. The king was now ready to do two things: 1. Bless the God of the Hebrew youth. He does not seem to have thrown away his other gods. He simply adds another god to the long list of those he already worshipped and blessed, or he granted tolerance to the Hebrew worship. 2. These Hebrews were not now required to worship idols, but were allowed to worship their own chosen God. Thus freedom of worship appears to have been gained for all captives, a great matter for Israel, and to preserve the true religion. This is quite clear from v. 29. The Hebrew heroes also gained special honors from the king in higher position...
